- or how prominent men came to be lifted above the heads of their former superiors? It is simply a question of knowledge and preparation. Those who surprise us by a sudden success have been, no doubt, preparing themselves quietly at home and have taken advantage of the many opportunities for the acquirement of knowledge, and of other people's experiences, and avoided their give them a glorious end with a stag handles and silver ferrules; 3-

General Grant was only known to a small circle of friends before he made himself famous as a leader and great general. The secret of his success was preparation.

Who knew Edison before he became noted as an inventor, and where did he get his education? He simply took advantage of the information contained in good books and the experience of others who were interested in the same lines of work as himself, applied the experience to his own life and became famous. Edison is not a college graduate; but by his own indefatigable efforts he has become } priced at the rate of the greatest inventor of the age.
